

Why Spain Won The 2026 World Cup

A tournament told through data · Canada / Mexico / USA 2026

8

matches

7

wins, 1 draw

14 – 1

goals for–against

7

clean sheets

CREATED BY

Aymane Labtiti

Built end-to-end in Python · pandas + matplotlib

The Road

Eight games, zero defeats

- GRP · Cape Verde
0–0
- GRP · Saudi Arabia
4–0 Oyarzabal (2), Yamal, Porro
- GRP · Uruguay
1–0 Baena
- R32 · Austria
3–0 Oyarzabal (2), Merino
- R16 · Portugal
1–0 Spain goal (unattributed)
- QF · Belgium
2–1 Merino, Spain goal (unattributed)
- SF · France
2–0 Oyarzabal (pen), Porro
- FINAL · Argentina
1–0 (aet) F. Torres 106'

In Possession

Out of Possession

Scored 14, conceded 1

Source FIFA / ESPN : cumulative goals across the 8 matches

Identity & Players

Best attack–defence balance of the deep runners

Source compiled data : per-match rates, Spain + beaten rivals

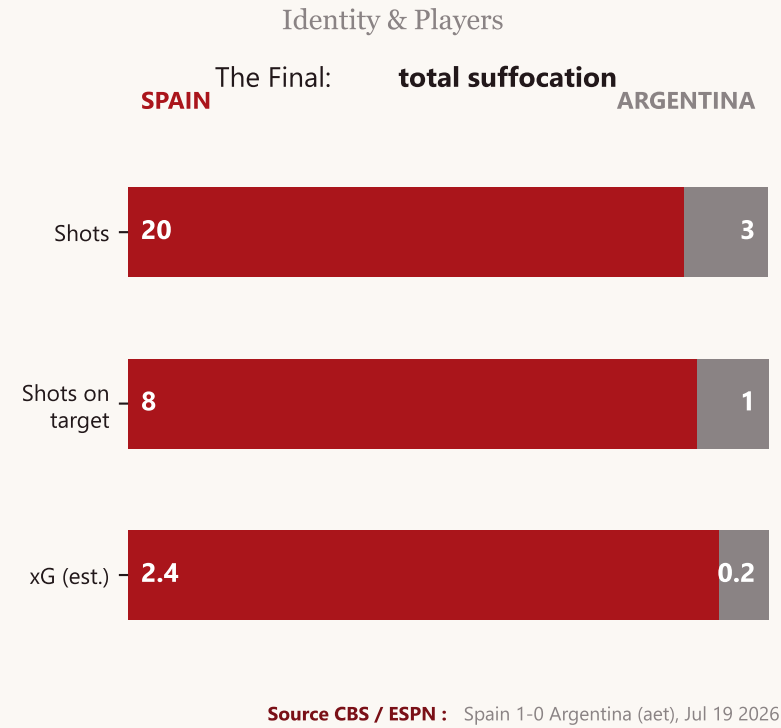

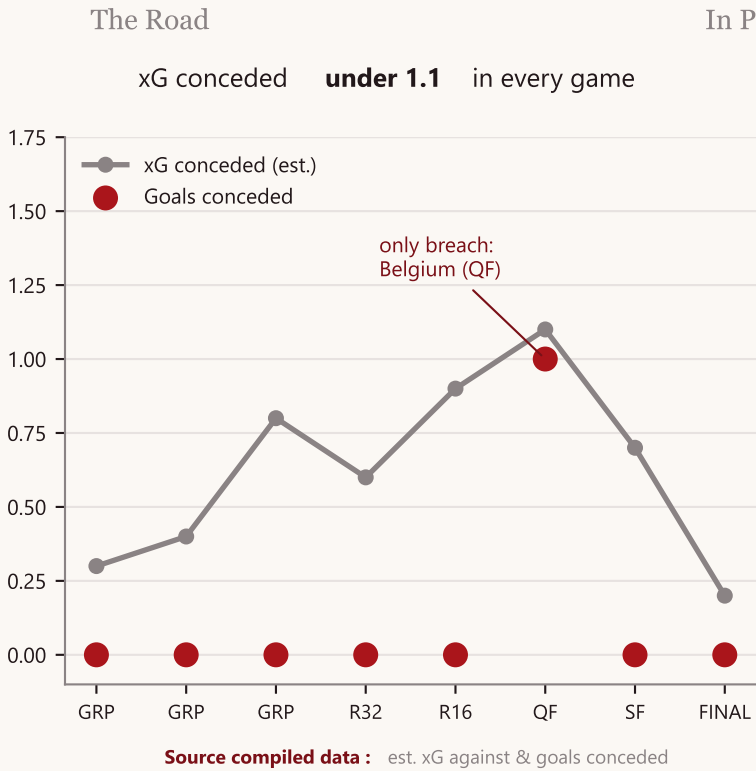

Spain's route was anything but soft: Uruguay in the group, then Portugal, Belgium, France and Argentina back-to-back in the knockouts — four top-10 sides eliminated in a row. The scoreline pattern is the story of the campaign: after a wasteful 0-0 against Cape Verde, Spain never dropped another point and never trailed at any moment of the tournament.

The attack-defence map on the right isolates why. Among every side that reached the last eight, Spain is alone in the top-right quadrant of the balance: 1.75 goals per game scored with just 0.13 conceded. Argentina and France matched the attacking rate — nobody came close to combining it with Spain's defensive record of a single goal in 750+ minutes.

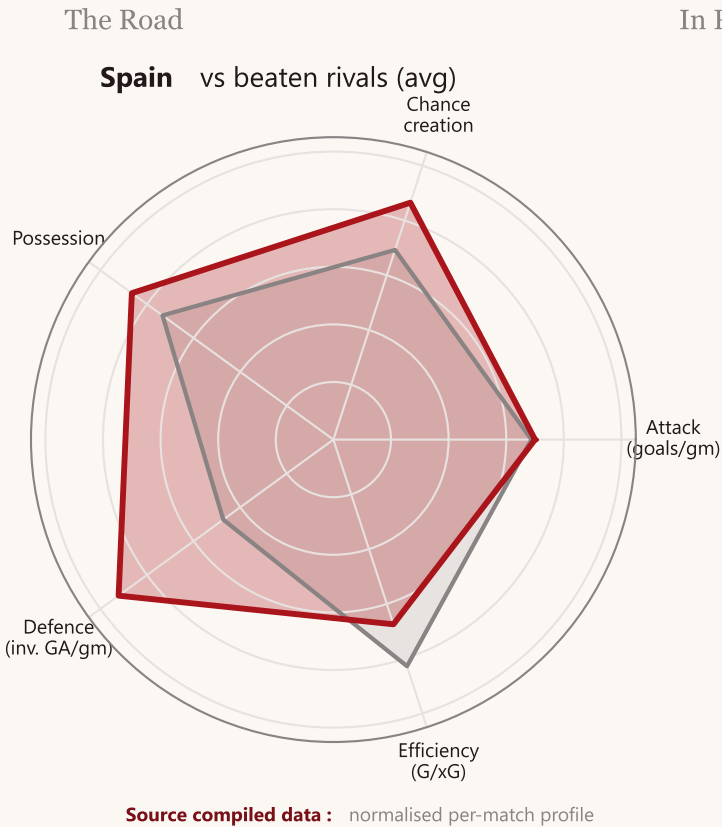

Spain suffocated opponents with the ball before beating them with it. Possession never dipped below 55% — even against France and Argentina — and peaked at 74% in the opener. That control is a defensive weapon as much as an attacking one: opponents averaged fewer than four shots per game simply because they rarely had the ball.

The chance-creation engine was remarkably steady: roughly 2.2 expected goals per match, every match, regardless of opponent quality. Early wastefulness (0 goals from ~2.1 xG vs Cape Verde) corrected itself as the tournament progressed. And crucially, the load was shared: Oyarzabal's five goals led the way, but nine different players contributed goals or assists — full-back Porro and midfielder Merino chipping in from deep. Take away any one attacker and Spain still scores.

One goal against in eight matches — over 750 minutes of football — is one of the great defensive campaigns in World Cup history, and it was no accident of luck: estimated xG conceded stayed near or below one in every single game. The only breach came from Belgium in the quarter-final, and it was answered within the same match. Unai Simon's seven clean sheets earned him the Golden Glove; 19-year-old Pau Cubarsi, the tournament's Best Young Player, anchored the back line throughout.

The final distilled the whole identity. Spain out-shot Argentina 20-3 and held Messi's side to a single shot on target across 120 minutes — a suffocating display capped when Enzo Fernandez was sent off in second-half stoppage time and Ferran Torres struck the winner in the 106th minute. An estimated 0.2 xG conceded in a World Cup final is domination in its purest form.

In Possession

Out of Possession

Identity & Players

RODRI

Golden Ball — best player

U. SIMON

Golden Glove — 7 clean sheets

P. CUBARSI

Best Young Player — age 19

M. OYARZABAL

5 goals — Spain top scorer

L. YAMAL

3.5 dribbles per game — best at WC26

F. TORRES

Scored the Final winner, 106'

Five reasons Spain won

1. Elite defence

One goal conceded in eight games; est. xGA never above 1.1.
2. Shared goals

Nine scorers, four knockout game-winners from four different players.
3. Midfield control

55%+ possession in every match, run by Golden Ball winner Rodri.
4. Squad depth

Oyarzabal & Torres delivered while Yamal worked back from injury.
5. Big-game nerve

Portugal, Belgium, France, Argentina beaten in succession.